

Beneath the Masks

Size: 70cm x 50cm x 50cm
Medium: Foam spheres, stone powder clay and acrylic paint.

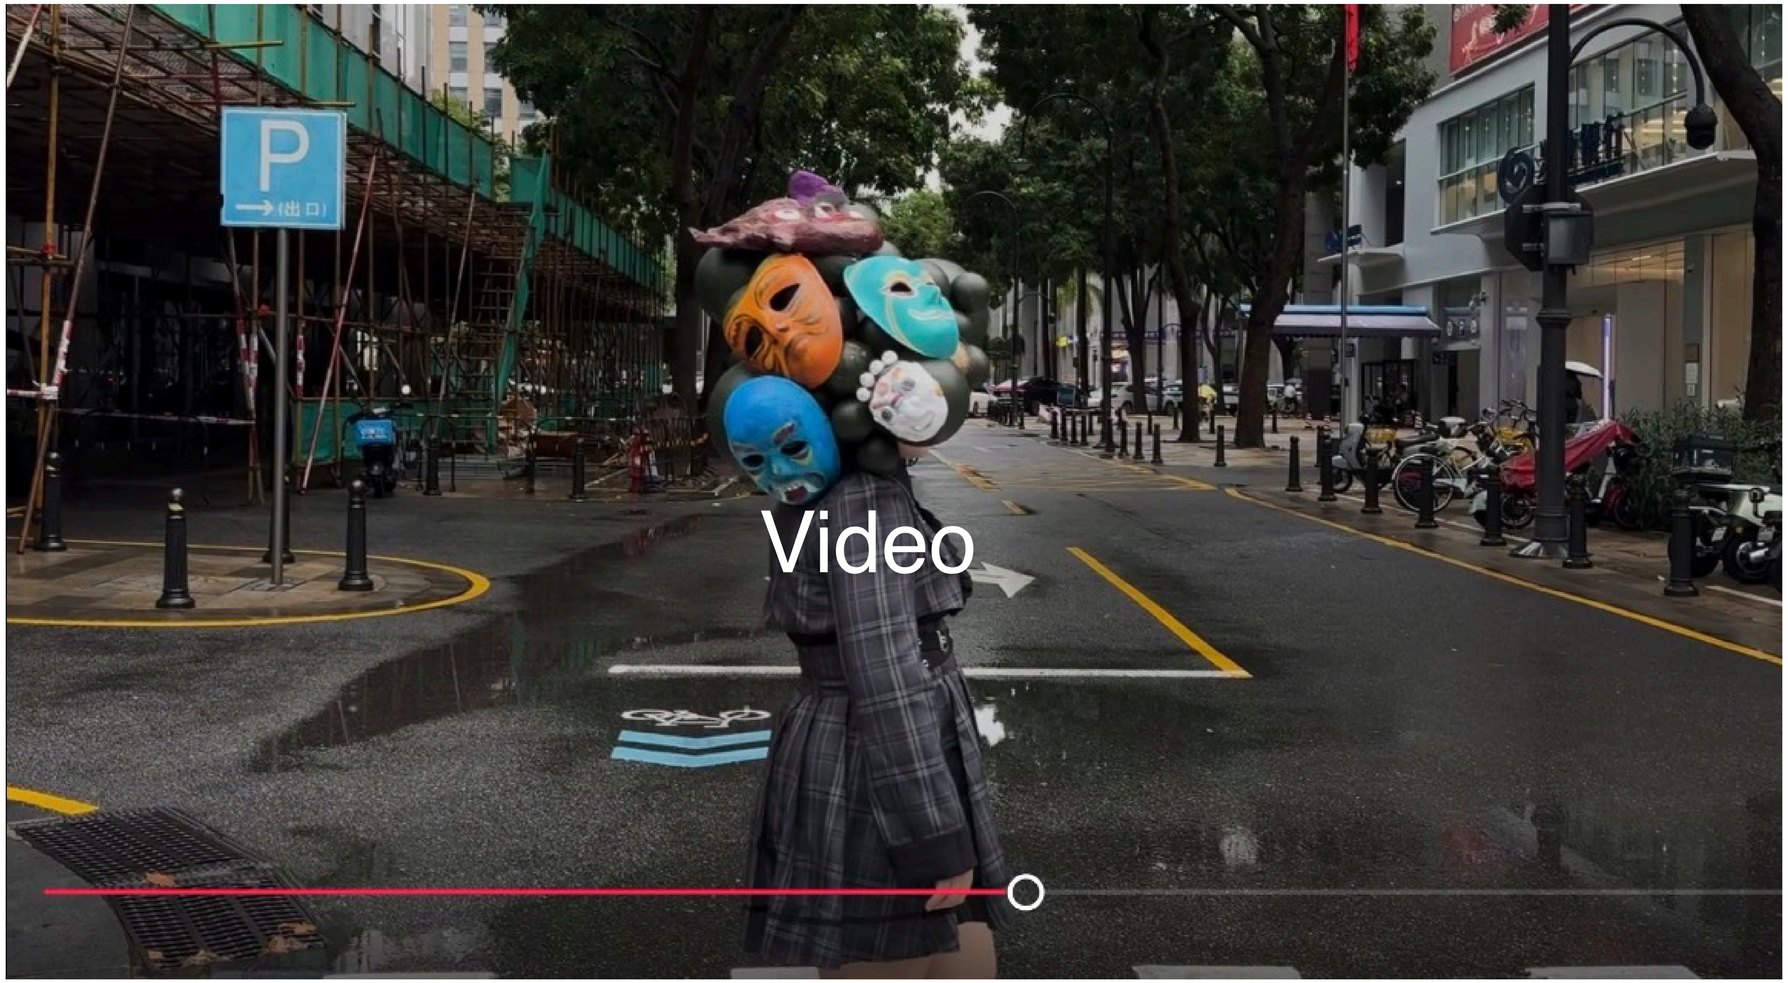

In contemporary society, people often construct personas in order to adapt to different environments and meet the expectations of others. At school, at home, in the workplace, and in public spaces, individuals constantly adjust their behavior and shape different versions of themselves. These personas are like masks layered over one’s true identity. Initially used for protection and social belonging, they may eventually become a heavy form of restraint.

I drew on character masks from traditional Chinese Nuo opera, focusing on figures associated with authority and social status. Assembled into a heavy headpiece, they symbolize the personas people adopt to project prestige, gradually losing freedom and a sense of self beneath their weight.

In the video, I begin inside an elevator, with each floor representing a different social setting, including a school, a shop, and the street. Each time I enter a new space, it is as though I take on another persona and continue moving forward while carrying its weight.
